Many. If you happen to sleep well, then you know how hard it is to get a good night's sleep. You toss. You turn around. You begged your partner to lower the thermostat. Yes, a fan and cooling pillows can help. But, according to Dr. Chris Winter, Winter, sleep scientists, and authors of The Sleep Solution, one of the best ways to prevent overheating in bed is to buy better sheets. There are a lot of hot sleeps out there that don't understand why they struggle at night and how many good sets of sheets can help them, Winter said. Once you understand the science behind why you sleep hot then you can start solving problems. (Now, night sweats can be a symptom of other problems, so if you wake up sweating in the middle of the night, you should see a doctor just in case). According to Dr. Winter, in a typical 24-hour cycle human temperatures rise and fall in a fairly predictable pattern. Unfortunately, most people's bodies are at their highest temperature just in bedtime and take several hours to get down to optimal sleep levels. The solution, therefore, is to hijack the system by surrounding yourself in a cooling environment. A good set of cooling sheets will remove moisture from your body, actually draw colder air through their fabric, and help your body start shedding the excess heat you need for a good night's sleep, Winter said. If you're a deep sleeper, he recommends cooling your room down to about 65 degrees at bedtime (actually the standard temperature for optimal sleep), sleeping in as much clothes as possible, and crawling between one of these sets of cooling sheets.
